Social Worker Explains Problems of Adolescence

If you have a teen-ager in your home, you can't afford to let his episodes, no matter how hair-raising at the time, make you nervous or over anxious.

The worst thing you can do is fail to keep an even keel and thus make him feel lonely and rejected.

This is the opinion of John Milner, Associate Professor of Social Work, USC.

Your adolescent youngster is already half sick with terror at the thought of solving the muddle in his young head, Milner said.

Chances are, his physical growth is ahead of his mental growth, or the reverse.

Feels "Different" Equally likely, he finds himself "different" because he's more mature in mind and body, or less so, than others his age.

His rebellion, his moodiness, his frequent tendency to "shut you out"—these are natural signs of his attempt to belong to his age group and to identify himself with it completely.

Your job is to stand by him, Milner said.

Occasion of his talk was a recent workshop session attended by professional youth leaders from police juvenile division, probation and parole departments, city playgrounds, schools and Community Chest services. The meet was sponsored by the Youth Services Division of the Welfare Council of Metropolitan Los Angeles.

Accept Him

Most of all, Milner said, the adolescent needs a "constant and consistent relationship with someone who will accept him as he is, who will know that he is not 'all good nor all bad.'"

"Don't expect him to act his age," Milner said. "Most adolescent tensions result from too much stress on actual age."

"Try to remember, he is fighting the most difficult battle of his life so far, to make himself acceptable to his group, society as a whole, and most of all to himself."

"Don't desert him in mid-stream. No matter how tough the job may be, make him feel you're for him and with him," Milner said.
